Recognizing Time-Pressured Headline Writer's Contributions to Readers

Introduction by Ralph Nader

It is remarkable that the newspaper writers you see first are the ones that receive the least attention and recognition. They are the anonymous concise and intense Headline Writers – who have to somehow sum up the main thrust or point of a report, story or editorial to catch your attention in the split second you accord them. They know this tiny window, and they have learned to make the most of a very few words. It is uncanny how they can take an intricate 700- or 1000-word report, story or much larger feature and elegantly compress its essence for the narrow space they are given. Sometimes, reporters are upset with headlines they think miss or distort the message of their content. Often for readers in a hurry, the headline sums up the message of what follows so well that a time-pressed person can skip to the next page or article.

Headline writers are the unsung deadline-driven workhorses in newspaper journalism. There are no Pulitzer Prizes for them. There are few prizes of any kind among the many regular journalism awards. There is, however, the ACES: The Society for Editing. It has an annual awards banquet during its annual conference. ACES presents a category of awards to winners of its yearly National ACES Headline Contest. It's a modest event, with the winners in various professional categories receiving between $75 and $300. Individual winners in student categories garner between $50 and $125. Sometimes the prevailing wordsmith reminds me of professional comedians – they don't always make many people laugh, but they score with enough people to pass muster with the judges.

Headlines that have rung the most bells tend to either have humor, poetic rhythm, or startling wake-up calls as shown by reader's comments such as “I never knew that,” or “That's awful,” “Incredible,” “Shocking,” “Fascinating,” “Repulsive,” “How cruel,” “Exciting,” “Way to Go,” “That's so Nice,” or “Isn't that Wonderful,” or “What Courage,” or “That's a Great Idea, why didn't I think of that?” “I've got to read more here.”

Probably among the all-time memorable U.S. headlines in recent decades were two by the New York Daily News: “Headless Man Found in Topless Bar,” and “Ford to New York: Drop Dead.” (That was President Gerald Ford denying federal aid requested by a deficit-ridden New York City). Sometimes headline writers contribute a little humor to their brief summation. Sydney Page of the Washington Post (December 9, 2021) offered this bit of mirth- “a bray of hope: an executive quits job to rescue donkeys.”

In an age of information, disinformation, or falsehoods and information overload, time is priced at a premium and that price can spell not getting any information you can trust, use and transmit. The Internet and television shorten attention spans almost by their inherent design of too much, too fast with minimum or no context to help provide understanding, or much less, simple comprehension. This is where headlines can help, by inviting you to go further into the story (e.g., a New York Times “Read Books, Live Longer?” by Nicholas Bakalar, August 3, 2016) or by telling you just enough to want or need to go no further. Done well, headlines are a form of efficiency and quick enlightenment, responsive to the frenetic times that surround us.

Given the foregoing, I thought about what might happen were headlines aggregated together, one after the other, without any of the material beneath them. What kind of experience would that provide for hurried readers who know they have missed a lot in past print newspapers that involved turning many pages to see what is of daily interest? I've tested a few of my friends, who say they read newspapers either online or in print regularly, by presenting headlines of articles from the previous week. They missed many of these stories, as they skipped over the paper or their screen in their haste and incomplete perusing of the various sections.

So, let's experiment with a collection of hundreds of headlines over the past three years from the New York Times and Washington Post. This collection is obviously a “quick read,” and may invite some surprising reactions beyond insightful exclamations. That is, it may be a way to have readers absorb, on the second go-around, materials they can put to use in various ways.

All this is not to say that headlines are without deficiencies or possess some of the usual biases of the content they highlight. Sometimes the headline writer misses the essence of the article, feature or editorial. Sometimes the reporter or editor approves copy that twists and turns so much that even good headline writers can get confused. Headlines can also overpromise and, when not on page one, require sub-headlines to explain less scrutable prime headlines. Headlines can contain mistakes. A New York Times headline writer wrote the FTC when the story was about the SEC. Headlines can be misinformed by a reporter who calls the National Transportation Safety Board (NTSB) a “regulatory agency” which it is not.

In authoritarian countries, a controlled press uses headlines as blatant propaganda, misleading or prevaricating often more than the copy that follows. Totalitarian regimes put such falsehoods to more extremes.

In our country, during highly charged news dramas, headline writers lose much of their autonomous judgments. For example, the New York Post blanketed its front page with the headline: “One Down. Two To Go.” This was regarding the resignation of the University of Pennsylvania president Liz Magill following the questioning of her and two other presidents of universities by Rep. Elise Stefanik (R-NY) at a Congressional hearing. This headline reflected the New York Post's editorial position on this event, as is the case frequently with this tabloid.

Less blatant but clearly associated with the political slant or caution over antagonizing a powerful constituency of its readers, the New York Times editors have toned down some of their reporter's most damning articles on Israel's war in Gaza. The Times' deciders seem to have occasional trouble using “Israel” as a noun followed by an active verb. In its November 11, 2023, edition, the lead article on Page One has the headline: “Gaza's Hospitals Bear the Brunt as Battles Rage.” Really? The only military bombing hospitals and other health facilities – over 150 according to the World Health Organization of the UN – is the Israeli Air Force, Navy and ground artillery. Why the passive voice? By contrast, in the same edition on November 11, 2023, the Washington Post headlined the same story “Israel Targets Gaza's Hospitals.”

The Times had had no problem at all using “Russia” as a noun leading a headline about its violence in Ukraine.

In the Sunday New York Times, November 19, 2023, edition, the headline is “Smoldering Gaza Becomes a Graveyard for Children.” Is it a smoldering Gaza that is producing a graveyard for children? Or is it the Israeli armed forces bombing at will everything and everyone in that tiny enclave of 2.3 million people, after announcing they were cutting “food, water, medicine, electricity and fuel...” after the October 7th Hamas attack on Israel? The New York Times has had a consistent professional bias against naming Israeli forces in the headlines when they are the perpetrators of the casualties. (See Appendix, “When Headlines (Don’t) Tell the Story” Extra! September 2014, page 9).

In that same Sunday edition’s Page One, headline writers were free to adopt proper grammatical/factual words in the other adjoining articles. Thus: “A Jan.6 Defendant Pleads His Case to the Son Who Turned Him In” or “Downtowns Are Full of Empty Buildings. Universities Are Moving In” or “Colombia Tries to Rein in Herd of Overeaters” or “Why is the College Board Pushing to Expand Advanced Placement?” or “Open AI Weighs CEO’s Return...”

“The Others” are always described with less charitable words. A meticulous content analysis by The Intercept of the Los Angeles Times, the New York Times, and the Washington Post between October 7 and November 24 found: According to the Intercept, “Major U.S. newspapers disproportionately emphasized Israeli deaths in the conflict; used emotive language to describe the killings of Israelis, but, not Palestinians; and offered lopsided coverage of antisemitic acts in the U.S., while largely ignoring anti-Muslim racism in the wake of October 7.”

The Intercept also reports, “The term “slaughter” was used by editors and reporters to describe the killing of Israelis versus Palestinians 60 to 1, and “massacre” was used to describe the killing of Israelis versus Palestinians 125 to 2. “Horrific” was used to describe the killing of Israelis versus Palestinians 36 to 4.”

A leaked New York Times memo instructs its journalists to avoid the words “genocide,” “ethnic cleansing,” and “occupied territory.” That is not just the reporters avoiding these words, but not repeating these words used by people quoted in these articles from their scholarship or eyewitness accounts.

There were some spirited disagreements at the Times on words not to be used for reporting on the Israel/Gaza conflict. Usually, when the editorial people have strong prejudgments, the headline writers, who wish to follow the actual content in articles, lose out.

I know of no headline writers who have quit their jobs over their perceived headline censorship or manipulation. Nor have there been any petitions yet expressing dissent over their professional judgments being dismissed. But it seems probable that they have argued with their superiors before shedding their preferred headlines. It has been nearly impossible to reach any of these headline writers on the telephone or via email. They seem to be an introverted bunch – “green-eye shade” types, as old-timers used to say.

The headlines in this collection are not bunched by category or subject. They may not even be chronological, though the date will be attached along with the name of the periodical and lead reporter, so you can download or otherwise obtain the full text of the story. [Note that online headlines may not be the same as the print edition headlines].

A very few of the many intriguing headlines chosen randomly I wish to share with you to illustrate my point about immediate reader reaction.

1. As Coronavirus Roils the Nation, Trump Reverts to Tactic of Accusing Foes of Felonies by Toluse Olorunnipa. Washington Post, May 12, 2020. (Comment: Clearly false and malicious, where were the defamation lawsuits?)

2. Twelve Signs Trump Would Try to Run a Fascist Dictatorship in a Second Term by Jonathan Greenberg. Washington Post, July 10, 2022. (Comment: With wide agreement and fear among Democrats having the majority in the House of Representatives, why weren't there more public hearings in the Judiciary or Oversight Committees?).

3. Anti-Racism Training Programs are in Demand by Maura Judkis. Washington Post, July 8, 2020. (Comment: Hmmm. Where, how, when?).

4. House Democrats' 2020 Election Autopsy: Bad Polling Hurt and GOP Attacks Worked by Paul Kane. Washington Post, May 18, 2021. (Comment: Are the Democratic Party leaders taking this seriously and re-examining their performance for the next election?)

5. Break up Amazon? Seattle Congresswoman Pramila Jayapal Takes on Tech Giants by Jim Brunner. Seattle Times, June 21, 2021. (Comment: What is she doing and going to do, or is this just verbal criticism?)

6. Nuclear Fusion Edges Toward the Mainstream by Stanley Reed. New York Times, October 18, 2021. (Comment: This is an example of a headline writer being misled by a "puffing story" boosting repeatedly failed R&D efforts going back to Princeton scientists in the Fifties and Sixties whose government contracts became their way of life on the cloud of hope springs eternal. Why pour money down this fusion rat hole when the best fusion reactor we'll ever have is the Sun? Solar is good for about 4 billion years, safer, more decentralized, diversely delivered and as a source, free. The headliner trusted the reporter and inadvertently misled the readers.)

7. Israel's Finance Minister Agrees to Release Funds to Palestinian Authority by Aaron Boxerman and Adam Rasgon. New York Times, June 29, 2024. (Comment: This is an example of a misleading headline and the subsequent report by the reporters does not support the headline. The story narrates all kinds of various conditions and tentativeness and generally contradicts this newspaper headline.)

Perusing such headlines one after another can remind you of things you didn't want to forget, can shape patterns that tell a larger story, reveal ignored solutions that remain so, encourage you to follow up as a civic advocate or voter and, as noted most desirable for the periodical, to have you move to read the text.

I wonder how readers will react to this presentation. Will they find the information contained in the headlines useful, motivating to follow up, or to connect them to friends and colleagues? Readers may see headlines as more than spot-on communicators. When you read a headline of a Senate Committee Report in 2013 exposing in graphic detail the ways Apple, Inc. avoids/evades taxes using small country jurisdictions abroad to park its tens of billions in profits, you can ask yourself – “You mean nothing was done in Congress since that Report to stop Apple's and other similar global companies from having minuscule federal income tax payments?”

The stagnation following public exposure in the media regarding government and corporate malfeasance and non-feasance is conveyed sharply by clipping headlines for later revisiting. “Why was nothing done about this terribly unjust situation?” Is this just a start for a subsequent editorial? For all that can be deplored about the mainstream media, taken together, it provides far more information for civic, political and economic action than our dwindling democratic society is absorbing for reform, change in directions, or revised priorities.

If you are a multi-issue activist, you'll see just how wide is the gap between knowing and doing anything about what we know. Consider the many headlines regarding the criminal justice system – both street and corporate suite crimes included. Coverage of the corporate crime wave in the financial, industrial, health and retail businesses afflicting millions of defrauded, harmed and downtrodden people has shown corporate ravages becoming worse and more immunized from accountability. The aggregated headlines reflect over time how this trend worsens as narrated by stories about the escape from the criminal law of the Sackler Family (opioids marketing), Wells Fargo bosses (millions of false accounts), Boeing executives (the 737 MAX homicides), the Exxon Mobil Et. al. (of major climate disruptions and spills), the drug industry's "pay or die" marketeers making more money with less competition, the massive casualties in the U.S. of hospital deaths and injuries from "preventable problems," (5000 fatalities a week) the rampant billing frauds totaling over $350 billion a year just in the healthcare industry, and on and on. (See, Reporter's Alert – reportersalert.org – for documentation).

Where reading thousands of pages on these predatory practices is not in the cards even for most activists, a panorama of headlines on these gigantic lawless phenomena can be viewed in a relatively short time with a longer impact on one's memory. In this volume, there are many headlines showcasing the corruption of corporations over government and the corruption of public officials over the public trust without any accountability – literally plundering above the law over and over again.

I look forward to receiving feedback from veteran citizen advocates and others who do read newspapers to see if they think expanding this Headline Project into more specific areas is warranted. And of course, I would welcome hearing from headline writers themselves.

Good Headline Writers Encourage More Newspaper Reading

by Ralph Nader
September 1, 2023

Have you ever met a newspaper headline writer? Not likely. They are remarkably anonymous, receive no byline, of course, and very little recognition. There is only one major award for headline writing even though headlines serve a critical purpose in getting readers to read the articles or features. (See, ACES: The Society for Editing).

Headlines are even more important in today's age of declining newspaper readership. That is why journalists respect the best headline writers whose genius is to read a story and figure out, under intense daily time and volume pressure, the essence of what is conveyed in an 800 or 1500-word narrative.

Sometimes the headline is so informative that it serves skimmers – who are not inclined to read an entire article –but can still get the gist of the story enough to talk about it with their friends. Here are very recent examples of noteworthy headlines from the Washington Post and New York Times. You can judge for yourself.

Here is an idea that might increase newspaper readership. It’s called convenience, something so many other businesses have learned to provide. Cut one page of photographs and devote the space to a “Table of Headlines.”

What do you think – anonymous headline writers?

APPENDIX II

When Headlines (Don't) Tell the Story

by Peter Hart

Extra! September 2014

Headlines are supposed to convey the essence of a news story, but often they served to obscuring the reality of the crisis in Gaza. A Reuters dispatch (7/8/14) reported the news that 23 Palestinians were killed—17 of them civilians—under the headline “ Hamas Rockets Land Deep in Israel as it Bombards Gaza Strip.”

When an Israeli missile struck a beachside café where a crowd had gathered to watch a World Cup match, the New York Times (7/10/14) went with the Web headline “Missile at Beachside Gaza Café Finds Patrons Poised for World Cup.” Many readers were alarmed at the idea that a missile might “find” a group of civilians; the headline was eventually changed to “In Rubble of Gaza Seaside Café, Hunt for Victims Who Had Come for Soccer.”

But if there was a lesson learned, the Times had a funny way of showing it. Just a few days later, the paper ran a dramatic account of the killing of 4 young boys on a Gaza beach. The initial headline—“Four Young Boys Killed Playing on Gaza Beach”—was apparently too precise, since it was later altered to “Boys Drawn to Gaza Beach, and Into Center of Mideast Strife.” Times public editor Margaret Sullivan (7/22/14) brought the complaints to editor Dean Baquet, who explained that while online headlines tend to be direct, the print versions are “a little poetic and written in the context of the whole.”

Poetry can come at a price, though. “Loss of Shelter and Electricity Worsens a Crisis for Fleeing Gazans,” read a July 30 headline. Homes and power plants were not “lost,” of course—they were destroyed by Israeli bombing.

Why a collection of headlines?

The newspaper writers you see first are the ones that receive the least attention and recognition. They are the anonymous and concise Headline Writers—who sum up the main thrust or point of a report, story or editorial to the reader’s attention in a split second. They have learned to make the most of a very few words. It is uncanny how they can take an intricate 700- or 1000-word report, story or much larger feature and elegantly compress the essence of a piece. Often, for readers with limited time, the headline sums up the message of what follows so well that a time-pressed person can skip to the next page or article. . . .

Consider the many headlines regarding the criminal justice system—both street and corporate suite crimes included. Coverage of the corporate crime wave in the financial, industrial, health and retail businesses afflicting millions of defrauded, harmed and downtrodden people has shown corporate ravages becoming worse and more immunized from accountability. The aggregated headlines reflect how this trend worsens as narrated by stories about the escape from the criminal law of the Sackler Family (opioids marketing), Wells Fargo bosses (millions of false accounts), Boeing executives (the 737 MAX homicides), ExxonMobil et al. (of major climate disruptions and spills), the drug industry’s “pay or die” marketeers making more money with less competition, the massive casualties in the U.S. of hospital deaths and injuries from “preventable problems,” (5000 fatalities a week), the rampant billing frauds totaling over $350 billion a year just in the healthcare industry, and on and on. . . .

A panorama of headlines on these gigantic lawless phenomena can be viewed in a relatively short time, with a longer impact on one’s memory. In this volume, there are many headlines showcasing the corruption of corporations over government and the corruption of public officials over the public trust without any accountability—literally plundering above the law over and over again.
